After a semester in Venice, Italy, Colgate University junior John Steigerwald is back at the Lorenzo State Historic Site in Cazenovia, working on an independent study project to complete a guide to artworks at the site. His project adviser is art and art history professor Mary Ann Calo, associate dean of the faculty.

Last summer, Steigerwald, an art and art history major from Fayetteville, held an internship through the Upstate Institute to create a working guide to about 80 fine arts works on display at Lorenzo. The guide is intended for use by the site's professional and tour staff, the volunteer corps and visiting researchers and scholars.

Each entry in the guide will include digital photos of the works; descriptive and historical information; biographical information on the artist; a bibliographic citation; examples of comparable fine art; and related/complementary interpretive information.

Steigerwald is continuing the guide entries this semester. But he is primarily working from photographs because all the artwork is in storage during construction at Lorenzo.

"I really only go down to look through their records," he said. "It's harder now because it's tough to see some details from a photograph."
